Summary

This project focuses on an area called “Alte Schanzen” in the very north of Vienna. The area contains four patches of calciferous grassland (about 9.5 ha), which are disconnected from one another as a consequence of intensive agriculture in their surroundings.

Based on a mapping of the area, measures have been developed to reconnect these patches of calciferous grassland with appropriate landscape structures.

For further analyses the area was divided into “subareas” (areas with similar landscape structures and similar potential as a habitat for protected species), for which aims and measures concerning the protection of species were determined.
